Hospitality is how everything should be done.

I recently immersed myself in Will Guidara's Unreasonable Hospitality.

It is a compelling narrative that underscores and celebrates the tenets of hospitality.

A must-read or listen for everyone who works in hospitality and every role that involves the customer experience. From being ranked 50th in 2010 to securing the top spot on the S. Pellegrino World's 50 Best Restaurants list in 2017, EMP's transformation was driven by a customer-centric passion that bordered on obsession.

Hospitality should be the standard operating procedure for how we do things. A standard for how we relate with one another, how we work and conduct business, how leaders should lead and how citizens should be governed.

True hospitality embodies the fundamental values of kindness, compassion, empathy, selflessness and resourcefulness. These intrinsic values become the compass of conduct and ethics; in essence, one's character.

Imagine a workplace where everyone has the spirit of hospitality and where colleagues support each other with genuine care and understanding. Such an environment would naturally foster mutual respect, collaboration, and a sense of belonging. Leaders would prioritize the well-being of their teams, ensuring that each individual feels valued and heard.

Employees, in turn, would feel motivated to contribute their best efforts, knowing that their work has a meaningful impact.

Extending these principles of hospitality to the governance of a community or an entire nation would result in leadership characterized by service, kindness and empathy. Public servants would seek to understand the diverse needs and aspirations of their constituents, making decisions that promote a collective good. Policies would be crafted with a focus on social well-being that empowers individuals to thrive rather than just survive. In such a society, citizens would feel a deep sense of connection and responsibility towards one another.

In essence, the principles of true hospitality have the power to transform societies into vibrant, cohesive, and flourishing communities. By nurturing the spirit of hospitality in every aspect of life, we pave the way for a future where everyone has the opportunity to live with dignity, purpose, and joy.

To paraphrase Eleanor Roosevelt, former US First Lady 'True hospitality consists of giving the best of yourself to others'

Will made me fall in love over and over again with hospitality. It is how I do everything. (and how everyone should, too).
